Gender, (class) and Higher Education

Dr Sally Jones, Reader in Entrepreneurship and Gender Studies,
Faculty of Business and Law, Manchester Metropolitan University

About Me

- Former Small Business Advisor and EU Business Support Project Manager.
- Before working in HE worked in micro and small businesses.
- First person in my family to go into HE.
- Main research interests: Gender and entrepreneurship education, gender and class in HE and the broader enterprise culture.
- Today I will focus on Gender and entrepreneurship education

“...language is not a neutral system which refers to ‘real’ objects in the ‘real’ world, but instead... it is through language that the world is given meaning...In this way, language is ideological because it makes what is cultural appear to be ‘natural’...”

Gendered Discourses of Entrepreneurship: The Fictive Student and The Fictive Entrepreneur

- Bourdieu and Passeron's concept of the Fictive Student.
- HE disciplines = gendered, Entrepreneurship = masculinised.
- How this underpins the Fictive Entrepreneurship Student and the Fictive Entrepreneur in HE entrepreneurship education and policy.

A hand-drawn thought bubble with three small circles leading to it, followed by the word "Fiction" written in a casual, handwritten script.

University Education

- 1: Embedding entrepreneurship --> embedding masculinity?
- 2: Wider understanding of gender in HE is ignored in entp. edu.
- 3: Lack of entp. definition, lack of discipline-specific texts, and educator pressures lead to adoption of default masculine material by powerful educators.
- 4: Do male students identify more easily with the masculine language, and feel like the 'right' fictive student.

What does this mean?

- Value of About modules as an entry point in HE – more inclusive because broader.
- Through modules may exclude certain groups of students.
- The closer modules get to practice the more masculine the language – not just ‘action’ – intellectual, visionary, competitive, creative capacities.

Led to Further Research

- Involved 100 students and explored the module selection process (Denmark and US)
- Developed highly masculine and feminine, and gender neutral module descriptions based on language in previously analyzed module descriptions (TAP)
- Explored cultural and gendered aspects of the module selection process.

Some Emerging Themes

- Emotional Responses to Gendered Language: Gendered language evokes an emotional response in students. Hinges on a sense of assertiveness, strictness and risk of failure in the masculine-framed courses and one of student-focus, support and openness in the feminine-framed descriptions. This varied between DK and US.
- A Masculine Norm: Lewis (2006: 454) argues that 'One of the luxuries of belonging to the privileged gender group is that one's own gender is often invisible to oneself'. When masculinity is the norm, neutral language may look the same to a member of the privileged group. Women were more attuned to the differences between neutral and masculine descriptions. Men commented on their similarity.

Some Emerging Themes

- The Intersection of Gendered Language and Culture: US students (men and women) appreciated the 'closeness' of the professor, talking to them directly as a student in feminized descriptions. Danish students felt it was too close (power distance).
- Reframing Entrepreneurship as a Feminized Activity: Early indications that students with a more nuanced understanding of entrepreneurship – gained through prior experience - and who also engage with extra curricula, entrepreneurial activities, find feminine course descriptions more appealing, compared to those with no 'real' experience.

Potential Implications

- Suggests that gendered language does sensitize students to the 'fictive' or ideal imagined student, who will benefit from and do well on these courses.
- Suggests educators should consider alternative ways of framing entrepreneurship courses. It is possible to find approaches that do not privilege masculinity and risk alienating both male and female students.
- Could help educators to reflect on how their own attitudes and beliefs about entrepreneurship, and their 'ideal' entrepreneur and student, are reflected in their course descriptions, and how the learning environment they promote might be perceived by students as a result.
- Implications for higher education and business support community more generally and the use of, and responses to, gendered language.
